4. Courses and curricula developed

I developed the course, FCD 609, Special Problems - Systemic Intervention in a Crisis, to provide advanced marriage and family therapy (MFT) students the opportunity to experience how systemic interventions are applicable in emergency situations. The practicum requires that each student work in East Alabama Medical Center emergency room.

I revised FCD 637, Professional Issues, to include field experience and provide networking opportunities for MFT graduate students. The Auburn University Employee Assistance Program director and I developed the "Lunch and Learn" series of presentations that the FCD 637 students provided as a University-wide service. An ongoing, twelve month, professional assistantship for a MFT student also came about from this joint undertaking. I also initiated bringing MFT alumni back to campus to meet with the FCD 637 students.

I developed a section of FCD 399B, Experiential Learning to provide undergraduates the opportunity to gain practical work experience with pregnant teenagers and their children through the "Godparent" program, a project targeted at child abuse prevention in Lee County.

5. Grants received related to teaching

Date of Funding:	August, 2015-16
Title of Project:	Graduate Assistantships (6)

Date of Funding:	August, 2015-17
Title of Project:	Graduate Assistantship
Project Director:	Smith, T.
Funding Agency:	Alabama Association for Marriage and Family Therapy
Amount Awarded:	$7,344.00

Between September 15, 1995 and August 15, 2015, I have procured educational grants totaling $812,221.00 from: East Alabama Mental Health, Alabama Association for Marriage and Family Therapy, Auburn City Schools, Dothan Behavioral Medicine Clinic, Lee County Habitat for Humanity, Child Advocacy Center of East Alabama, Lee - SCAN, Lee County Youth Development Center, Tri-County Child Advocacy Center and East Alabama Medical Center.

6. Teaching philosophy and self evaluation

I believe that maximum learning occurs through the convergence of several sources of exposure. First, students must have an interest in the objective or an interest must be kindled by the teacher. This situation varies as a challenge for me as a teacher at Auburn. Graduate students and social science majors usually come to my classes with an interest already present. My job in that case is to inform and enhance that interest. This may or may not be the case with undergraduates from other curricula within the university enrolled in my Mate Selection class. I believe it is my job with the above mentioned students to make the material interesting and relevant to their lives.

Second, up-to-date, factual information must be presented to students through a variety of methods. Research suggests that different students learn best from different methods of exposure. Therefore, assigning students readings, offering lectures, engaging in discussion, offering question and answer opportunities, requiring students to submit written reactions to lectures and/or readings, and research, write, and present papers are all methods that I utilize to afford every student multiple opportunities to learn and integrate subject based information. Several of the above mentioned methods also encourage and/or require students to think. I believe that thinking is imperative to the university learning process.

Third, I believe that learning that involves humans, as every social science major does, is not complete without an experiential component. We can provide students with empirically based information, but we will always be challenged by the fact that each specific human may be an exception to any rules we believe are generally applicable. As a practitioner, I understand the challenge of integrating scientifically based data into human services. I encourage undergraduate students to seek involvement with real people, through volunteerism, practicums, and internships. These experiences prove to be invaluable to students as opportunities to apply their newfound didactically gained knowledge, measuring it against their own dearly held notions, personal experiences and talents. One of the greatest tragedies, to me is the student who undertakes an academic track, only upon completion to find they do not enjoy or are actually ill suited to it in practice. My commitment to teaching extends to a commitment to help students find a profession they will enjoy and be successful in. At the graduate level, my commitment to determine a student's fitness to become a marriage and family therapist is also informed by my ethical duty as a licensed mental health professional to protect the public.

4. Description of candidate's scholarly program

My research interests are informed by my clinical work and my dedication to investigate and improve the ways in which people with problems are served. I have become suspect of "clinical wisdom" as the guiding force in therapy, instead believing that solid research findings should guide clinical practice. To contribute to this goal, I have maintained two active research programs, one focused on empirical research with clinical implications, the other focusing on research into the process of therapy. For the last ten years my empirical research program has been primarily focused on the area of divorce/remarriage and the accompanying clinical implications of the findings (Halperin & Smith, 1983; Smith, 1991). I am currently involved in several collaborative research projects with HDFS faculty and graduate students. The first is a large scale investigation of the effects of parental divorce and/or conflict on young adults' attitudes toward marriage and college adjustment. Several publications have resulted from this project (Grant, Smith, Sinclair, & Salts, (1993); Jennings, Salts, & Smith, 1991). Two publications reporting the results of a second project focused on the development and evaluation of remarried education materials for the ACES were also completed (Fitzpatrick, Duncan, Williamson, & Smith, (1997); Fitzpatrick, Smith, & Williamson, (1992). Finally, I am involved in two additional projects investigating the relationships between step-grandchildren and step-grandparents.

The second research area in which I have a major interest involves process issues in therapy. Process research, which investigates what occurs during therapy sessions, is an important but neglected area of clinical inquiry. The marriage and family therapy (MFT) literature correctly states that we can not be fully confident in our clinical theories and methods if we do not understand how they actually unfold in the context of therapy. I was involved in two collaborative research projects with the other MFT faculty members and several graduate students. The first project investigated the magnitude of client resistance associated with different therapy techniques and various spatial arrangements of the therapy environment. A publication resulted that indicates that the theoretical foundations of the investigated family therapy techniques are correct (Allgood, Bischoff, Smith, & Salts, 1992). The second project found that client's pretherapy attitudes and perceptions of change predicted the successful use of several different family therapy techniques during the course of therapy (Allgood, Parham, Salts, & Smith, (In press). Currently, I am involved in an ongoing clinical project with the other MFT faculty members that resulted in several presentations.
